Brunner Down, But Not Out

December 17, 2009 12:00 PM | Permalink | Comments \(7\) | Share This

By Erin McPike

OH Sec/State Jennifer Brunner (D) has vowed to keep her SEN campaign alive until the May primary and even made it to DC on Wednesday for a fundraiser with an Afghanistan veterans group.

But, Brunner conceded in an interview, she will continue reporting below-average fundraising numbers at the end of this quarter. "It will look like I won't at the end of this quarter," she said when asked whether she will be able to run a credible paid media campaign.

Brunner replaced her finance team earlier this year in an effort to beef up fundraising, but she has since decided to "roll with the punches." She said she realized that with all of the institutional support going to LG Lee Fisher (D), she's been forced to run a grassroots campaign, and she thinks it's going well.

"I started my law practice out of the corner of my bedroom," she said. It eventually grew to 32 people. "When you start a small business, you have to run things as lean and mean as you can. I think donors appreciate when you don't waste their money."

The DSCC has all but written her off, however, and the establishment has turned to Fisher. In fact, Brunner said when she spoke with DSCC Chair Bob Menendez in Sept., he first told her that he "didn't want to see a Democratic candidate at the end of the primary with zero dollars," and he followed up that his organization would go into the state to work against a candidate perceived as "being negative in the primary or not raising enough money."

Brunner said she responded: "If you do that, the women of Ohio will never forgive you." Menendez, she said, retorted: "I know you're not scared of me, and I'm not scared of you."

(For their part, the DSCC points out they elected 4 new women in the last two cycles that they actively recruited and with NY Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, MA AG Martha Coakley and MO Sec/State Robin Carnahan, they've got another 3 this cycle.)

Fisher is also winning the endorsements battle. He has the support of Gov. Ted Strickland (D), as well as several Dem members of the Ohio congressional delegation, including Reps. Tim Ryan, Zack Space and Charlie Wilson.

The Buckeye State, Brunner noted, is expected to lose 2 congressional districts after the '10 Census, and she said each party can expect to shed one. For that reason, Brunner said that when she met with Space, he "admitted his endorsement of Fisher had to do with the governor's potential role in determining which districts would be eliminated after the census."

Update: Space's office denies the charge. "With all due respect to Secretary of State Brunner, Rep. Space never said that at all. What [Space] told her was that while he has the utmost respect for her, he believed that ... Fisher's efforts to bring about new economic development and jobs is precisely what Ohio needs at this moment when the national economy has devastated Ohio's workers and industries," campaign spokesman Brent Parrish said in a statement emailed to Hotline OnCall.

Brunner also said several mayors backing Fisher told her they were doing so to protect money headed to their cities.

And though Rep. Marcia Fudge (D) is neutral in the primary, Brunner said Fudge told her that she would make a better candidate than Fisher.

Brunner stressed that it's not just about money or endorsements, though, and reiterated that she just wants to win voters. "I'm doing well in polling," she offered.

Indeed, Quinnipiac's trend lines show her having closed a gap this fall against Fisher. In its latest survey of 394 RVs, taken 11/5-9 with a 4.9% error margin, Fisher led 24%-22%, after having led by 9 points in mid-Sept.

The DSCC points out that some recent polls have showed Fisher polling better against ex-Rep. Rob Portman (R), the likely GOP nominee.

Brunner's most potent possible ally, EMILY's List, has been notably absent from the race. She said it's been a while since she spoke with the organization.

"They discouraged me from running because the governor was supporting Fisher," she explained but said she doesn't understand why they would stay neutral in a primary where they had a decent chance of electing a woman who already holds statewide office to the Senate.

But Brunner has also suffered from bad press throughout the year for ethics flaps, along with Dem strategists crowing that her campaign is dysfunctional.

She has had to defend herself after she transferred 2 campaign employees to her official office. One had skills better suited to the official office, she said, and the other was replaced on the campaign by a consultant. "I know it probably looks odd," she said, but she insisted that neither one is involved in the campaign now.

But Brunner said the onslaught of negativity and attacks from within her own party is not demoralizing.

"I had lots of death threats last year," she said, referring to the role she had to play in overseeing the emotionally (and racially, she said) charged '08 presidential election in OH. "For 7 weeks I was supervised by the highway patrol," she said, pulling out her "souvenir," a highway patrol badge. "I was sued 15 times in 8 weeks by the Republican Party."

Except 1) overlooks the rather obvious trait shared by these three candidates: all are women who have run and WON statewide and 2) they didn't get involved in MA, which was decided in the primary.

Jennifer Brunner dishes in D.C. (Marcia Fudge, Zack Space, are your ears burning?) Yikes.

By Stephen Koff, The Plain Dealer

Chuck Crow, The Plain Dealer

Ohio Secretary of State Jennifer Brunner in a 2008 interview with The Plain Dealer Editorial Board.

UPDATED AT 2:40 p.m.

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- Jennifer Brunner came to Washington on Wednesday and uttered things that the Ohio media only wishes she'd said to them. But sorry, Buckeyes, Ohio's secretary of state saved her dish for National Journal's Hotline, which has about the same penetration in Ohio as, say, the Bakersfield Californian.

So here's what Ohio voters missed: Brunner thinks she'd make a stronger candidate for U.S. Senate than Lee Fisher, who is now Ohio's lieutenant governor -- and at least one Ohio Democrat in Congress, Marcia Fudge, feels the same way, despite her stated neutrality. Brunner also said that another congressional Democrat, Zack Space, has an ulterior motive protectionist impulse on clean-energy projects would be a job-killer: editorial for supporting Fisher: He's trying to save his seat during the coming round of redistricting.

Brunner and Fisher are vying to run in next November's election to replace U.S. Sen. George Voinovich, who is retiring. Former congressman and Bush budget director Rob Portman is expected to be the Republican on the ticket.

But Fisher is getting more fund-raising support and endorsements, including those of congressmen such as Space. Why is that? Here's how it was described to National Journal:

"The Buckeye State, Brunner noted, is expected to lose two congressional districts after the '10 Census, and she said each party can expect to shed one. For that reason, Brunner said that when she met with Space, he 'admitted his endorsement of Fisher had to do with the governor's potential role in determining which districts would be eliminated after the census.'

"Brunner also said several mayors backing Fisher told her they were doing so to protect money headed to their cities.

"And though Rep. Marcia Fudge (D) is neutral in the primary, Brunner said Fudge told her that she would make a better candidate than Fisher."

Some Democrats in Washington are mighty unhappy over Brunner's comments. The National Republican Senatorial Committee is giddy, on the other hand.

Did Brunner, Space and Fudge really say these things? In Space's case, no, or so says the spokesman for his congressional reelection committee.

"With all due respect to Secretary of State Brunner, Congressman Space never said that at all," said Brent Parrish, spokesman for Zack Space for Congress. "What the Congressman told her was that while he has the utmost respect for her, he believed that Lt. Governor Fisher's efforts to bring about new economic development and jobs is precisely what Ohio needs at this moment when the national economy has devastated Ohio's workers and industries."

We're awaiting additional responses, with updates to follow.

Seriously.? Lt. Gov has done what to help retain jobs in Ohio? Where was he with this?

<http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2009/04/17/60minutes/main4952111.shtml>

What about NCR in Dayton?

Portman is no better with his ties to the Bush Administration.

People, Jennifer Brunner is our best shot for U.S. Senate. She is the only one of the Dems elected in 2006 that has actually accomplished the goals she set for the office. Cuyahoga County elections - a perfect example!

If people think they are going to bring down Portman and raise Fisher on the jobs issue (creation and retention) that is going to zero them both out.

Wake up people.. Lets be a little more progressive and elect a woman who really will go to work for us.
